O-2: Set forth the rationale for the proposal:

The current description for the final project has a strong "dissertation" orientation. A faculty committee reviewing this description suggested that it be "toned down" to reflect the fact that this is not a full-blown dissertation.

DPA Final Project

The final written project has three primary purposes. First, it affords students an opportunity to demonstrate to the faculty's satisfaction their ability to apply the knowledge, skills and values acquired during their coursework in the D.P.A. program. Second, the project affords students an opportunity to apply what they have learned to a topic that not only has personal and professional meaning to them, but also advances the quality of the practice of public administration in policy or program areas in their organizations. Third, the project affords students an opportunity to step back from their everyday experience, and place that experience within the larger context of public administration practice and theory.

A successfully completed final project thus has three components: It deals with a topic of interest to the student, explicitly addresses and is related to broadly defined core problems and questions in public administration, and studies the topic in methodologically rigorous ways. Topics meeting these criteria may come from, but are not limited to issues of: organizational dynamics, policy diagnosis and prescription; program, budget or policy planning, development, implementation and evaluation; and the legal, ethical and political implications of public management.

Students employed in public or not-for-profit agencies may focus their analyses on operations of their own organization. They may also, or conjointly, address research questions dealing with other organizations affecting or affected by their organization's programs or policies. All students, regardless of their vocational affiliations need to discuss their proposals in detail with the members of their committee to ensure that their choice of topics conforms to the fundamental purposes of the DPA.
